This week, we honor the power of education, leadership, and courage in Black history. On February 9, 1906, Paul Laurence Dunbar, one of the first nationally recognized Black poets, passed away, leaving a legacy of storytelling that gave voice to the Black experience with dignity and truth. His words reminded the world that our stories matter—and that faith, perseverance, and creativity can open doors even in the face of adversity.

As we reflect this week, we celebrate how Black leaders, educators, artists, and believers have used their gifts to uplift communities and inspire generations. May their legacy encourage us to walk boldly, speak truth, and continue building a future rooted in faith, resilience, and hope.
